Abstract: Earthmoving / construction equipment have evolved significantly during the last century. During the same time our ability to study and understand equipment economics and productivity has also gained significant grounds. This paper relates some of the recent academic research to industry practices. In doing so, it validates some parts of the research as well as makes new observations in three areas: repair costs, residual values, and total cost of ownership & productivity. It also provides a few pointers for future research.